QUESTION 1

Which victims I remember?

domestic violence, violent news, police violence, war?

Kimberlé Crenshaw

QUESTION 2

Who selected these images that we have memorized?

We need to reflect on the fact that every memory is constructed. And in particular, every collective memory is constructed for the purposes of the present. So when a populist movement, for instance, uses collective memory in a certain way, it presents it as a given, as a natural memory, but in fact it is a constructive process. We need to expose this constructive aspect of memory building.

Chantal Mouffe, agonistic memory

QUESTION 3

How have this images influenced my ideas?

QUESTION 4

Why archive this?

What is at issue is the violence of the archive itself, as archive, as archival violence.

Every archive is at once institutive and conservative. Revolutionary and traditional. It keeps, it puts in reserve, it saves, but in an unnatural fashion, that is to say in making the law.

QUESTION 7

Which past are we going to save?

SHORPY

Lewis Hine's gripping early 20th century images of American children working at grueling jobs — in coal mines, textile mills, factories and cotton fields — have become emblematic of photography's potential to effect social change. His haunting photos of girls in threadbare dresses working massive cotton looms, taken during the decade Hine worked as an investigative photographer for the National Child Labor Committee (1908-17), awakened middle-class America to the ugly truth of child mistreatment and helped change American labor laws.

Decolonial aestheSis

Decolonial aestheSis are processes of thinking and doing, of sensing and existing, in which the modern distinction between theory and practice has no purchase.

Decolonizing the senses means, decolonizing modern, postmodern, and altermodern knowledge regulating aestheSis, in order to decolonize the subjectivities controlled under the modern imperial aestheTics and their aftermath.
